Good practice is modelled for you by your learning facilitator based on their experience in creating and supporting some of the biggest and most successful online environments.

“Your company is more likely to attract the brightest and keep them if its own internal communications reflect the slick, collaborative informality of Web 2.0, with its blogs, wikis and social networking sites.”

All you need to know to become a facilitator of online communities, networks and groups. You will develop your understanding of the varied nature of collaborative online and how you can enhance your facilitator skills to make them successful in your context.
